In an easily accessible document from the government of Colorado, a full $3,671,750 went to the "School Capital Construction Assistance Funds" in the month of January 2016. That ~~revenue~~ revenue came from the legal sale of cannabis products. The discussion on coal mining today has frequently referenced our dependence on coal for money for the funding of our schools. If we take a note from Colorado's playbook, we could easily reduce and even eliminate that reliance. To do so would be to continue raising the standard of an academic Support structures (areas ALREADY being impacted by decline in coal demand as evidenced through the University of Wyoming's budget & hiring freezes), without incurring the damaging ecological effects of fossil fuel production.
