The arctic region is extremely important to nesting shorebirds, not to mention other wildlife species. If shorebirds are impacted on their breeding grounds, it will lead to a serious reduction in there population. Look at the Big Picture. The migratory habitats for shorebirds is already in decline due to development and other modifications, not to mention rising tides due to global climate change. What about the status of there non-breeding habitats, it should be considered also.

Must we impact every inch of our planet, the only one we have, just to allow big cooperations and their benefactors to accumulate more wealth, it's all about the dollars. Let's use some common sense and quite playing politics with the Arctic NWR and protect a small part of our planet from further destruction of our wildlife.
